

Project Rang

Problem:

Rural women are amazing at traditional crafts, but they can't easily sell their stuff to a bigger audience. On the other hand, people who want to buy ethical things are stuck. They either find super expensive luxury items or cheap, mass-produced junk. There's not much in the middle that's both good quality and affordable. Plus, making cotton uses a ton of water, which is bad for the environment. So, we're looking at a problem that's social, financial, and environmental all at once.

Our Plan:

We help rural women by teaching them about design and money management, turning them from homemakers into business owners. We sell eco-friendly, hand-painted things at good prices, bridging the gap between being green and being affordable. By selling directly to customers, we cut out the middleman, so 60-70% of the money goes straight to the women who make the products.

Our USP:

Every product comes with a special tag that has a QR code. When you scan it, you can read the story of the woman who made it, where she made it, and how your purchase helps her. It really connects the customer to the artisan.

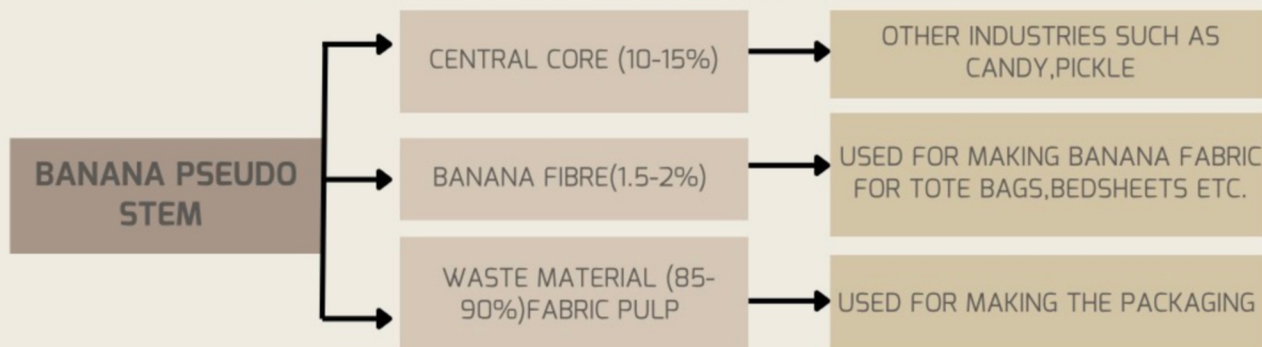

- We use sustainable banana-fiber fabrics from other companies.
- We can get into the market fast without much risk.
- We make things only when ordered to avoid waste.

- We pay the women artisans fairly and directly.
- Every product has a story tag.

About Banana Fibers:

One banana stem → fabric + zero-waste packaging

Our Product:

Everyday utility items targeting youth and students, including Hand-painted Tote Bags, Wallets, and Multi-purpose Pouches.

Premium, aesthetic items for households and gifting, featuring Block-printed Bedsheets, Table Runners, and Cushion Covers.

Functional products designed for the modern workspace, such as Artistic Laptop Sleeves, Fabric Journal Covers, and Cable Organizers.

Eco-friendly by-products made entirely from our production fabric scraps, including Scrunchies, Coasters, and Keychains (ensuring 0% landfill waste).